September 10 is World Suicide Prevention Day, and Movember uses this day to pay attention to male suicide, which is so desperately deserved. In the UK alone, 13 men die by suicide per day. All over the world, one person takes his own life every minute. It's all minute. But we're still not talking about it. The Movember Foundation will tackle the unspoken male suicide crisis, and they want your help spreading their message: Men, let's talk when things get tough, How simple it may seem to be to talk about a problem can be the hardest challenge for a large number of people, and it can lead to avoidable consequences. The purpose of this movement is to encourage men to reach out when times go hard and talk about the difficulties they are going through. By sharing videos through social media and channels, you'll help break that silence and develop the conversation. The Movember Foundation is the official charity partner of the men's series of Men's Health Survival events in the Fittest series of events. Sign up today, come and help raise money for a charity that will get men to talk openly about mental health issues such as depression and suicide - sign up here! I'm busy. Can you come back later? Thank. We covered it. We don't have a budget for that. You have probably heard all of the above: on a par with the exchange rate when trying to sell our ideas, products and services. But it can be demoralizing to keep running towards people who are running in a different direction once they see you come. Here are three ways to motivate decision makers to give you a chance in the most important first minutes. The first words from your mouth should be: I know you are busy and can I have three minutes of your time? Do you know of any decision makers who are not engaged? If you start talking and don't immediately ask for a certain amount of time, people are already impatient. If people don't know how much valuable time you're going to take, they're already outraged because they think: You don't know how busy I am?! Acknowledging that they are busy, people are more likely to listen because they know it's for a limited amount of time. Instead of being distracted and thinking: How long will it take? They know exactly how long it will take. Also, you ask, not invent. Instead of running into a one-sided spire that keeps them hostage; you are from their attention. They are much more likely to give it to they voluntarily did it. Want a quick way to pleasantly surprise and auspiciously impress decision-makers? Compact the request or proposal for a portion of the allotted/expected time. I had a client who met with the CTO of the London Olympics. I asked him: How long do you have for your pitch? He said: One hour. I said, Mike, you don't have an hour. Start by saying: I can only imagine how much you have on your plate. I overtook my pitch for 10 minutes. If you would like to continue the conversation afterwards, I welcome it. If you have something urgent to handle, we can follow later. This manager will be grateful to you for being effective in time and for honoring their packed schedule. They will conclude that you are exactly the type of supplier they want to work with; someone they can trust to cut down on the lead and not waste their time. Put yourself in the mind-set of your decision-makers. Why would he or she say no to what you offer? Why won't they be interested? Prove it first. If you don't, they won't really listen; they will wait for you to stop talking so they can tell you why it won't work. Imagine what they think: You have to be crazy to come here to ask for money; we do not have left in our budget. Voice that objection by saying: You might think I'm crazy asking for money as there's nothing left in your budget, but if I can have your attention for the next three minutes, I can show you exactly how we're going to make that investment in the first six weeks. Let's say they think: We've tried this before, and it doesn't work. The voice is that out: I can only imagine what you think: We've tried this before and it doesn't work. You are right and I have determined exactly where we went wrong the last time and how we can prevent that happening this time, so it will be a profitability for all participants. Remember, if you don't resolve their doubts, they won't consider everything you say because they've already made up their minds. So, who is the decision maker, who may not want to talk to you? Do you meet with a VIP client who asks for financing from an investor by offering a strategic partnership? Use these three steps to overcome your impatience and objections so that they are motivated to listen. RJ Harber, Attorney at Law, RJ Harber Law Office, Texas I've tried several movie listing apps, and they generally range from comically bad to just competent. This program from Flixster, simply called Movies, puts all other programs in disgrace. Specially designed, Movies has a smart interface that allows the user to learn what flicks are playing, and it includes many other neat features, too. Categories you can view include Box Office, Theaters, Upcoming, DVDs, and My Movies. Simple Box Office listings let you browse by movie title. You see the rating of each movie on the popular review site Rotten Tomatoes, the main actors, rating, the duration of the film, as well as how much money the film has raised so far. If you click on any specific title, you will receive even more information, such as show times, video links to trailers, photos, synopsis, an extended list of cast, criticism and user reviews (you can also add your own review) and links to other Movies Websites.On the Theater tab, you can search theaters in your region either by name or away from the zip code within the 30-minute range. It can also download movie theaters to Google Maps. The Future tab allows you to keep track of the which will appear soon. Both this tab and the one for new DVD releases are as easy to view as the Box Office Listings tab, and they contain similar information. My Movies lets you personalize your listing app favorite movies, reviews, photos, and more. It can also connect to websites such as Facebook, Flixster and Netflix.The app is not without its flaws. Sometimes screen load time is a touch on the slow side. Also, as you know, the application has problems with some phones, such as HTC Hero. However, overall it is a huge app that does a lot of things right. Note: When you buy something after clicking links in our articles, we can earn a small commission.
